1. On 14 August I called [REDACTED], PPC Plans Officer, and [REDACTED], Logistics Plans Officer, preliminary to proceeding further with our OTR emergency planning. I advised them both we were now beginning to receive preliminary planning from the supporting components of OTR.

2. Mr. [REDACTED] said he was glad that we had called. They had just received the Office of Security plan as a finished document which, according to [REDACTED] had not been coordinated with all of the interested Agency components, with the result that the plan will have to be drastically rewritten. [REDACTED] advised that he and Major [REDACTED] also of PPC, would like to get into our planning process at this point to assist with guidance and in some instances actual writing of paragraphs concerning the global war plans. I intend to work closely with them.

3. With [REDACTED] I discussed the possibility of their detailing an individual to assist with the logistical planning that needs to be done to support the School and Staff plans we are now receiving. Carl didn't promise anything but feels we probably will be able to get someone detailed from the Plans Staff of the Office of Logistics to help with this. [REDACTED] also cleared up two questions I had in mind. Budget wise, OTR will not be charged for materials stockpiled for post D-day activities until we have actually received and used the items. In most instances, the Agency will merely levy requirements on the armed forces at home and overseas and there will be no requirement for reimbursement until actual delivery is made. I also asked if this would apply to Agency-peculiar items such as [REDACTED] devices we might want stockpiled for post D-day training. It was Carl's understanding that here, too, we would not be required to provide funds until after receipt of the equipment. As concerns a possible alternate site [REDACTED] there is an ODM 7-5 that makes the Department of Defense the executive agency for real estate requirements in time of war. Through this arrangement without present reimbursement by CIA, an area can be selected and set aside for post D-day occupancy.

If OTR will levy such a request, as other Agency components have, Logistics can identify possible sites and arrange for an OTR reconnaissance of areas of possible interest to determine their suitability.
